As Secretary of State, the negotiations upon the subject were entrusted to James Buchanan and he, with his customary love of compromise, accepted the forty-ninth degree of latitude in place of the disputed "54-40." In drawing up the treaty under this compromise it was found, however, that the forty-ninth parallel would divide Vancouver's island and a further compromise was therefore made so as to stipulate that the boundary line of that parallel should be so deflected as to yield all of that great island to the British, running the line comb doard there—"till our old gent ame back"—which offer was thankfully so declected as to yield all of that great; island to the British, running the line through the "principal channel from the straits of Jana de Fuca to the Gulf of Georgia."

Under this treaty and compromise the question rested, in statu quo, until 1856, when a Joint Commission was ordered, to survey and fix the boundary line and saw then leave with real regret; from the conformity with the stipulated provisions. This labor involved no particular addituelities, it being only necessary to fix geographically the forty-ninth parallel and mark the survey, until the commission was necessary to fix geographically the forty-ninth parallel and mark the survey, until the commission reached the waters of Puget Sound. At this point, where the boundary was to be deflected, a controversy immediately arose as to which was "the principal control of the control of the
